

Leaving for America

For this column, I am pleased to be able to reprint the next in a series of articles that were written by Mr. Gene Aksamit, a colleague of mine in the Czechoslovak Genealogical Society International (CGSI) and resident of the Twin Cities:

In the next few columns I plan to change the focus from vital records to leaving for America – how our Czech ancestors were enticed to leave, how they traveled to an emigration port, where the emigration ports were located, the voyage, and arriving in America.

The decision to leave their homeland for a new country far away across an ocean must have been a very difficult one. So why did they choose to leave? Certainly there were various reasons, but the prospects for better economic opportunities and avoidance of military conscription for their sons were frequently the reasons. While forced labor which was in existence under serfdom was abolished after the 1848 uprising, economic conditions actually worsened for both unskilled laborers and skilled tradesmen as demand for their services fell in the ensuing years. In the meantime, the Homestead Act of 1862 in the U.S. made the prospect of free land very attractive and many Czechs emigrated because they wanted a larger piece of land.

The actual obligations of military conscription seemed to change frequently under the 300 years of rule by the Habsburgs. In 1866, the idea of universal obligation to serve became Austrian policy and most men between 21 and 23 faced induction. The 12-year service obligation could be divided among active duty, national guard (Landwehr), and reserves.

With the frequent conflicts, lengthy service was a real possibility. An interesting twist is that some land speculators successfully used the scare of military service to convince some families to leave and to sell them their property at a low price¹.

Beginning in the 1850s, emigration agents working for shipping companies went out into various villages and towns to recruit emigrants to pass through the ports of Bremen or Hamburg. The agents provided favorable reports of the New World from earlier emigrants and posted notices and ads (see illustration) for the shipping companies. Some of the agents were unscrupulous and took advantage of unsuspecting emigrants. One such incident² occurred when several families from the Pilsen, Bohemia area contacted an agent in Hamburg requesting to be sent to Nebraska. Instead, they arrived in the port of Auckland, New Zealand in June 1863! The agent was receiving bonus money from the English for bringing immigrants to New Zealand. After 1862, U.S. railroad companies also actively promoted emigration in Europe because they had land given to them by the U.S. Government as part of the Homestead Act of 1862 to sell. It was not uncommon for these ads to tout exaggerated claims. Some examples: The Great Southwest (Texas and Oklahoma) – “crop failures are unheard of and produce grows in great abundance”; Nebraska – “unequaled for its beauty of scenery”; northern Minnesota – “moderate climate, soil more fertile than Iowa’s”.

Understanding the conditions that existed and the various reasons that our ancestors emigrated is an important part of our family history.
